

DUKE UNIVERSITY'S 2015 SERVICE OF CELEBRATION
THE REV. DR. MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR.
*Dignity Through Dissent: Demanding
Civil Rights in a Modern World*

SUNDAY, JANUARY 18, 2015
THREE O'CLOCK IN THE AFTERNOON
DUKE UNIVERSITY CHAPEL
DURHAM, NORTH CAROLINA

Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. speaking in Page Auditorium on November 13, 1964.

Martin Luther King, Jr. is remembered as a crusader for civil rights. He advocated for civil rights in many ways: including voting, through assembly, and through dissent. As we in North Carolina reflect on a year of protest, from Moral Mondays to Ferguson, we consider: what does it mean to have real voting rights today? How does marriage equality fit into the broader civil rights struggle? And what do publicized examples of police brutality mean for people of color around the country? Dignity Through Dissent focuses on those who assemble, protest, and occupy spaces in an effort to secure civil—and human—rights. This year we also remember the life and legacy of Dr. John Hope Franklin as one who inspired dignity through dissent.

John Hope Franklin
(1915-2009)

Born in Rentiesville, Oklahoma, on January 2, 1915, John Hope Franklin was the third of four children born to Buck and Mollie Franklin. In 1925, the family relocated to Tulsa, Oklahoma, four years after the infamous Tulsa Race Riots which destroyed home to one of the wealthiest black communities in the country, with a downtown district known as "Black Wall Street". It was against the backdrop of violence, segregation, and rebuilding that John Hope Franklin began his personal journey to change society. Franklin attended Fisk University and Harvard University for his education in the field of history. He began his career as an educator at Fisk University, during his time in graduate school, and accepted his first full-time position as professor of history at St. Augustine's College in Raleigh, NC in 1939. Over the course of the next 70 years, Franklin would teach full-time at six colleges and universities (St. Augustine's College, North Carolina Central University, Howard University, Brooklyn College, The University of Chicago and Duke University). He also served as a visiting professor and lecturer at universities around the globe. Franklin was the author of twelve books and hundreds of articles and speeches. He is best known for the best-selling From Slavery to Freedom: A History of American Negroes. Originally published in 1947, From Slavery to Freedom remains in publication today, has sold over three million copies, and has been used in classrooms for decades. Franklin was engaged with activism throughout his life, most notably joining a team of scholars to prepare research for the NAACP for the landmark 1954 Supreme Court case Brown v. Board of Education. During his public life of service, Franklin became a leading voice on issues of race relations, civil and human rights, education, childcare, and public policy. The marriage of his scholarship and activism demonstrated his philosophy of using history not only to understand the past, but also to chart a course to a better society in the future.

John Hope Franklin was married to his college sweetheart, Aurelia Whittington Franklin (1915-1999) for fifty-nine years. Their union bore one son, John Whittington Franklin, in 1952. While serving as a visiting professor at the University of Hawaii in 1959, Franklin took an interest in cultivating orchids, which, along with fly-fishing, served as beloved leisure activities. Many people who met Franklin or had the pleasure to call him a friend, remember him fondly for his strength, humility, dignity, and uncanny ability to connect with people, no matter their title or credentials. The endearing nature of his personality and his commitment to engage with the community beyond the hallowed halls of academia made him one of the most revered public intellectuals of recent memory. John Hope Franklin died on March 25, 2009, in Durham, North Carolina. He was 94 years old.
